Debates are raging about the fate of the earth, but what does environmental quality really mean for humanity? This fall, the New Jersey Council for the Humanities will take a closer look at the connections between justice and the environment throughout American history.

Sharing the Delaware Bay
Saturday September 10, 2011
3:00-5:30pm, with reception
Bayshore Discovery Project, Port Norris, NJ
Commercial fishermen, environmentalists, recreational users—each group has an interest in the Delaware Bay. This panel discussion will bring together representatives from universities and the local community to ask how we have weighed competing claims and managed access to limited resources.

Newark’s Industrial Legacy
Wednesday, November 2, 2011
6:30pm-9:00pm, with reception
Newark Museum, Newark, NJ
The legacy of industrial activity in Newark continues to mark the city’s landscape. Join a group of Newark scholars, activists and residents to discuss how history has complicated this postindustrial environment.

Why Environmental Justice Matters
Date and Location TBA
Many social, economic, and political decisions impact the environment, but are all of these impacts felt by all people? This panel will consider the environmental decision-making process and discuss the work of the environmental justice movement.

All events are FREE and open to the public.
